Humanism.

Humanism is a non-religious ethical perspective based on an interest in human affairs on a human scale. It is not a doctrine nor a set of rules; it is a starting point, being its founding idea that ethics should be based on the facts of human experience.

For some, the result of thinking for themselves about ethics might be close to a conventional moral perspective. For others, the result might be less conventional. Either way, there are only two limitations: that one's decisions should not harm others, and that one should be able to make a solid case for one's perspective if challenged by others

*“Growth is never by mere chance,
it is the result of forces working together”*

James Cash Penney

An important assumption that humanism makes is that people are, or at least can be, self-creating and self-determining. But, in many cases, the burden of history and society makes self-creation impossible. This happens when people are trapped in a religious tradition which tells them what to think and how to behave, and refuses to allow them freedom.

But the effort to be a free-minded individual in pursuit of worthwhile goals suited to one's individuality is surely central to the very idea of the good: it is what gives us our best chance to be fully human, and at the same time – in the spirit of shared humanity – to develop our affections in our communities, to promote the values of kindness and tolerance.
